Day 2 Exercise

Exercise

Recreate an original design in HTML + CSS:

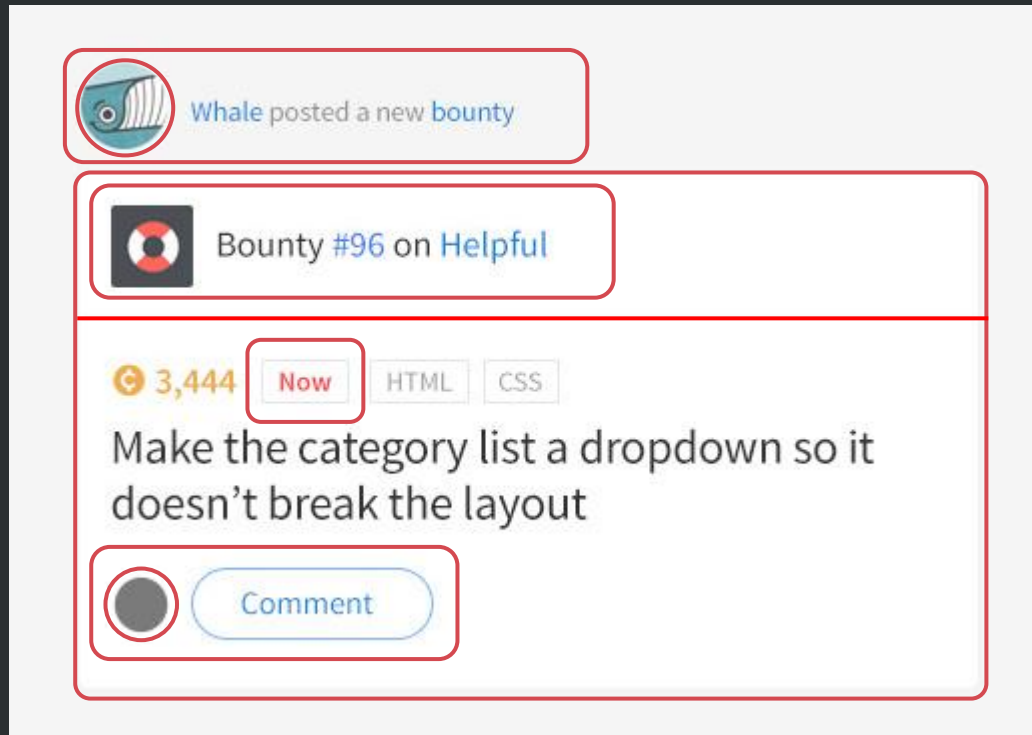

1. Use bootstrap to set the initial layout, when the HTML is ready, start tweaking the aesthetics with CSS.
2. Try to name your classes not by the way the elements look, but by their purpose.
3. When it makes sense, treat styles as modules, something that can be repeated across a website. Maybe in the same page.

Start with the basics, what Bootstrap components do you identify?

Hint ;)

BTW, use the Roboto font for the typography. Maybe just the Normal weight will do.

Don't worry too much about the images, use an image placeholder like... I don't know... placecage.com

Colors in use.

Anyway, check this out.

Already done? Nice.

Matthew, you're so good looking. I am really impressed by your intelligence and handsome looks on top of being a world class dad. I am so lucky to have married you.

Duplicate the module and fit a 'likes' and a 'comments' section.

Again, think what Bootstrap components would solve the task.

Think of these as two separate sections, which they are.

I guess this was easy right?
Next step.

IRON
HACK

Duplicate the module a couple more times, remove sections that may not appear in some cases.

Also, make it responsive. In small screens they should be stacked in one column. For devices with viewports larger than 768px make it behave like in the image. Also, the container should be centered on the page, not filling the 100% of the viewport's width.

Hack MIT

More than 1000 students from dozens of schools including, MIT, Harvard, UPenn, Michigan State, Berkeley, Stanford, and way more descended upon Cambridge yesterday morning to make stuff together at HackMIT

I've written in the past about how awe-inspiring student hackathons can be, and HackMIT was no different. But I wanted to take a minute to call... more

As an event sponsor, I was lucky to have the chance to spend the weekend hanging out with all of these smart, talented, entrepreneurial students and chatting about As... more
